Retail Store Survey of Consumer-Use Indoor Pesticide Products, 2014

Abstract

The Department of Pesticide Regulation's (DPR) Surface Water Protection Program (SWPP) staff conducted a store survey in the Sacramento region to provide a snapshot accounting of pesticides currently available to the general public for indoor use. Unlike pesticide use by professional applicators, pesticide use by residential users is not reported or tracked. During a survey of 10 stores, 62 active ingredients (AIs) were identified in 194 products. These AIs were then grouped into high, intermediate, and low priorities based on number of available products and aquatic toxicity. Thirty-one of the 62 AIs are prioritized for developing and validating analytical methods in a wastewater matrix for future monitoring efforts.

Introduction

Many indoor-use pesticide products are available to consumers through retail channels. Unlike pesticide application by certified pesticide applicators, indoor pesticide use by homeowners is not reported to DPR and not recorded in the pesticide use reporting (PUR) system. Moreover, new products are constantly introduced and changes to formulation and type of AI in existing products are difficult to track. Furthermore, product registration information may not clearly indicate indoor versus outdoor use.

Indoor pesticide uses have the potential to enter the wastewater collection system through routine cleaning and bathing activities (Figure 1). If not removed during the wastewater treatment process, pesticides may be discharged to surface waters. A store survey was conducted to provide a snapshot accounting of pesticides currently available to the general public for indoor pest control including pet products, general pest control products, and products applied to indoor plants. The results of this study will be used to develop a better understanding of indoor pesticide use patterns that have potential to contaminate water discharged into wastewater collection systems.

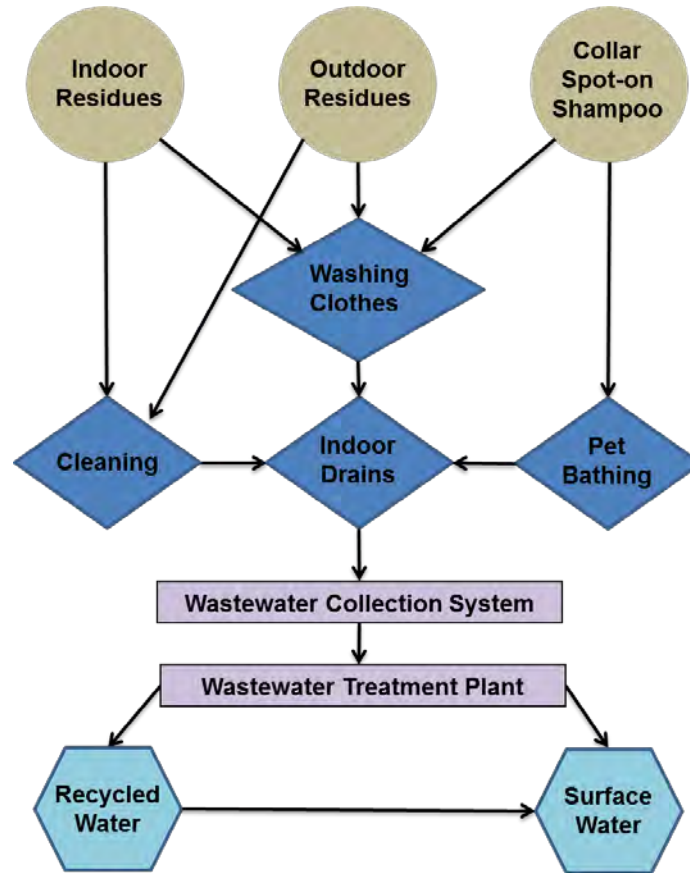

Figure 1 - Conceptual model of potential pathways for pesticide products to wastewater collection system. Indoor residues could include dust from foggers, granules, sprays, and gels. Outdoor residues could be from urban or agricultural pesticide application (adapted from Moran and Tenbrook, 2011).

Objectives

1. Identify AIs currently found in products labelled for indoor use.
2. Categorize number of products by AI, use type, product type, and percent AI.
3. Evaluate primary pesticide groups of identified AIs.
4. Identify priority AIs for development of analytical methods for untreated wastewater.

Methods

Retail store surveys are a means for identifying pesticides currently available to the general public. A shelf survey at 10 retail stores was conducted to evaluate the pesticide products available to the public for indoor pest control (Table 1). The types of retail stores surveyed were home supply, pet supply, garden supply, hardware and big box. The store surveys were completed on two separate events in the Sacramento region. A complete summary of available products is presented in Appendix A.

Results and Discussion

A total of 194 individual indoor-use products, representing 62 distinct AIs, were identified and can be categorized into 16 chemical classes (Figure 2). The three chemical classes with the largest number of products, in order of abundance, are pyrethroids, hormone mimics and synergist (solely represented by piperonyl butoxide). Pyrethroids are a class of synthetic insecticides that have been routinely quantified in surface waters of California at concentrations toxic to aquatic organisms (Ensminger et al., 2013). Hormone mimics include AIs that inhibit or mimic juvenile hormones by disrupting insects' molting processes. Piperonyl butoxide is a synergist used in conjunction with pyrethroids to increase toxicity. A complete list of products, organized by AI, is presented in Appendix A.

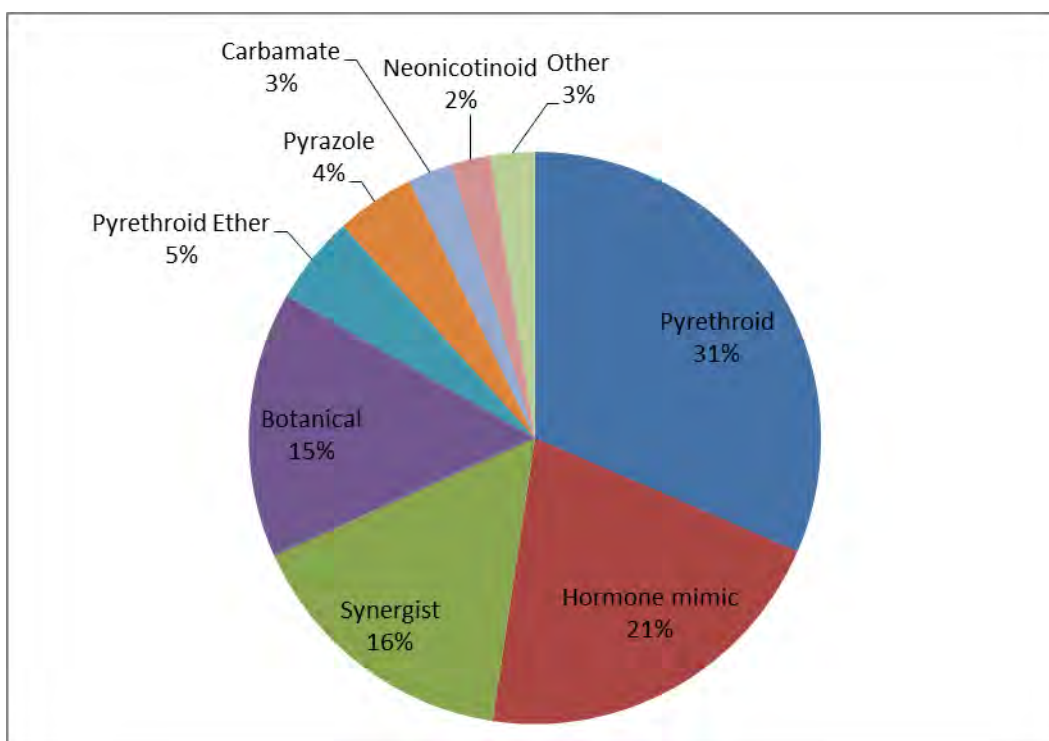

Figure 2 - Distribution of chemical classes among the products surveyed. Many products contain more than one AI. Other includes benzoylurea, organophosphorus, alcohol/ether, inorganic, oxadiazine, substituted benzene, and essential oil.

Products can be grouped into three use categories: home, indoor/outdoor, and pet (Table 2). Products designated for home and indoor/outdoor use may leave residues on interior surface or on clothes. Pesticide residues found on indoor surfaces from the use of foggers and sprays have been reported in the literature (Mahler et al., 2009; Simcox et al., 1995). Routine cleaning activities, such as mopping or laundering, may be responsible for down-the-drain transport of indoor pesticide residues. Over half of the products identified are designated for pet use. Pets are routinely washed in sinks, showers, or tubs, which represent a pathway for pet products to enter wastewater sewershed (Figure 1). The use pattern of a given product will influence the likelihood of an AI reaching the sewershed through down-the-drain transport with potential impact to wastewater treatment plants and the receiving waters to which the plants discharge into. Note that SWPP staff assumes that a survey of Sacramento area stores is generally representative of stores throughout California.

For future wastewater monitoring efforts, AIs were organized into three groups based on aquatic toxicity levels including both United States Environmental Protection Agency (USEPA) aquatic benchmarks and the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry (IUPAC) minimum aquatic toxicity levels (Table 3). Toxicity values range several orders of magnitude from parts per billion down to parts per trillion concentrations.

High priority chemicals include all pyrethroids (including etofenprox), fipronil, pyriproxyfen, and imidacloprid. The majority of products include a pyrethroid, most commonly permethrin, etofenprox or lambda-cyhalothrin (Figure 3). The occurrence of pyrethroids (a subset of those identified here) and fipronil have been reported in wastewater treatment plant influent and effluent indicating incomplete removal during the wastewater treatment process (Weston et al., 2013; Heidler and Halden, 2009).

Intermediate priority AIs include piperonyl butoxide, propoxur, chlorothalonil, tetrachlorvinphos, (S)-methoprene and novaluron. Although piperonyl butoxide has a relatively low toxicity level alone, it acts as a synergist and increases the toxic effect of pyrethroids. (S)-methoprene is found in many products (n=42), however has a relatively low toxicity to aquatic organisms. Propoxur, chlorothalonil, tetrachlorvinphos, and novaluron are relatively toxic to aquatic organisms; however, they are not found in many products (<10).

The AI's in the low priority category have relatively low toxicity to aquatic organisms or do not have synergistic properties include ethyl alcohol, indoxacarb, pyrethrins, sulfur and d-limonene.

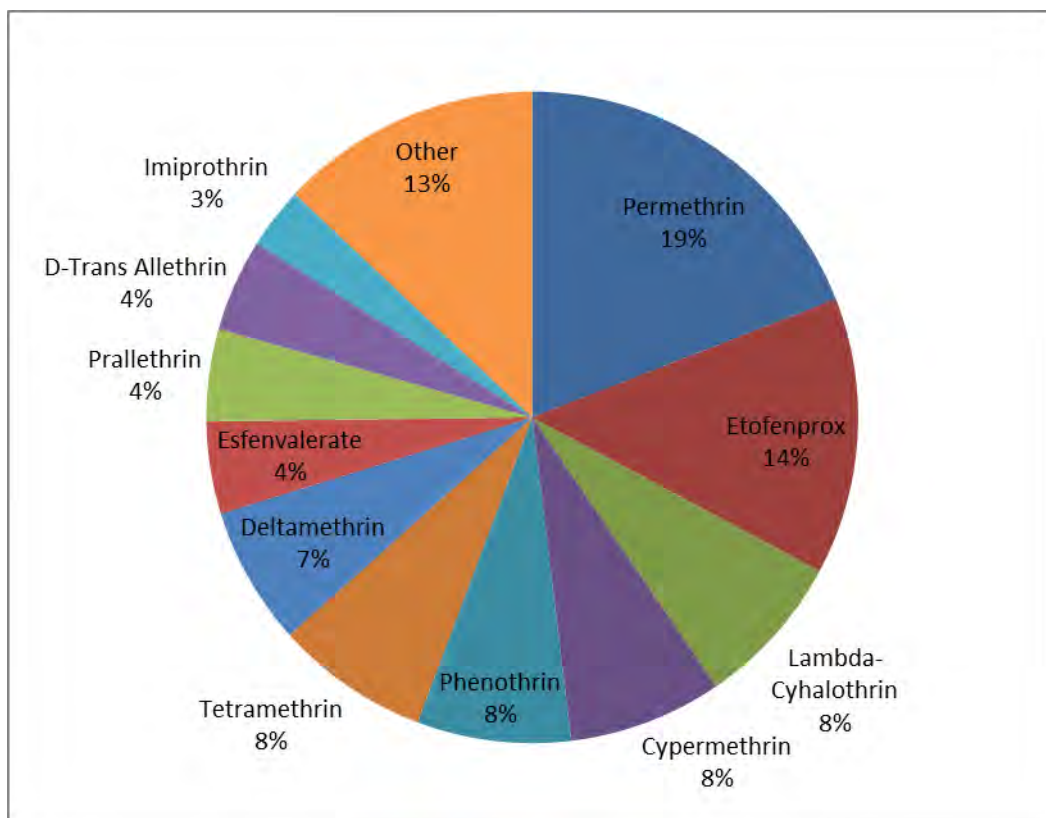

Figure 3 - Distribution of individual pyrethroid chemicals among the pyrethroid products identified in the survey (n=86). Other includes gamma-cyhalothrin, zeta-cypermethrin, bifenthrin, tralomethrin, cyphenothrin, sumithrin, d-phenothrin, s-bioallethrin, and beta-cyfluthrin.

¹Priority denotes level of importance for analytical method development, H: High, I: Intermediate, L: Low

²DPR Number is a unique identifier assigned by DPR for each AI.

³OPP Min All BM = minimum Environmental Protection Agency Office of Pesticide Programs aquatic benchmark.

⁴IUPAC Min All Tox = minimum International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry aquatic toxicity standard.

Findings

SWPP staff conducted shelf surveys at 10 retail stores and identified 194 indoor-use pesticide products with 62 AIs representing 16 chemical classes. Nearly half the products identified are designated for use on pets. The AIs have been classified as high, intermediate, or low priority for future wastewater monitoring efforts. There may be additional pathways for pesticides to enter the wastewater collection system; however, the shelf survey does provide a reasonable starting point to understand which AIs should be included in efforts to develop and validate analytical methods for a wastewater matrix for future monitoring.
